The ideal educational system that I dream of should be centered on each student's personality and providing them with the adequate process and tools to acquire the universal values of a healthy lifestyle, freedom and happiness.

The process, which would be adapted to the particularities of each student, should be based on active and direct experience methods at the student's pace and perseverance. Rote learning should be a thing of the past giving way to performing tasks and carrying out projects through which the students acquire theoretical knowledge as well as practice implementing it in a stress free environment.

The tools would be the well-equipped science laboratories and gyms in every school where most of the teaching activity would take place. The ultimate technology equipment should make available the grasping of the principles that govern the existence of substance and universe. Doing physical exercise would not confine to school's gym, as trips in the nature should be frequently made.

Acquiring as much as they want from the fountain of knowledge, students should embrace with the assistance of well qualified teachers the principles of a healthy and environment preserving lifestyle, of freedom of thinking and happiness.
