What is the goal of teaching students: making them do well on tests and get into colleges or for them to be successful? I believe in evolution and I think the educational system can change, by helping the students see all the world's opportunities.

In my opinion, the school is a deep and dark forest under a glass dome where the hunters teach the animals how to hunt. Thus, the students are framed up as capital creatures, not human beings. I feel that too much emphasis is placed on memorization as opposed to creativity, and too many students are more concerned about getting good grades than actually learning. If I were to change the educational system, it would be based on freedom of choice and on developing skills in a profession.

The educational system should be just twelve simple steps up heaven's stairway to gold, not a coal-covered road to grey factory. Therefore, the creativity and the innovative and bold students' ideas should be encouraged with art, writing or communication classes. The world needs more colours. Furthermore, it is extremely important to create volunteer experiences by helping the less fortunate. Students need to develop their own thinking and creativity; compassion, kindness and friendship are the values school should teach.

Changing the educational system is not impossible. But if all that is done is teaching compliance and consumption, that is all the world is going to get. School can and must do more than train the factory workers of tomorrow.
